Teenagers on the Move: The Rise of Electric Scooters

Electric scooters are taking over city streets — and teenagers are leading the charge. These sleek, battery-powered vehicles have become a symbol of freedom, fun, and modern urban life. But as their numbers grow, so do concerns about safety and responsibility.

For many teenagers, electric scooters are more than just a trend. They're a practical solution to everyday transport problems. "It's faster than the bus and cheaper than a car," says 16-year-old Maya, who rides her scooter to school every morning. In crowded cities, scooters can cut travel time in half, slipping easily through traffic and parking almost anywhere.

The financial appeal is another big factor. Buying or renting an e-scooter is relatively affordable compared to other forms of transport. Parents also appreciate that scooters are electric, meaning no fuel costs and no harmful emissions. In an age when young people are increasingly aware of climate issues, this green mode of transport fits perfectly with their values.

But the scooter revolution has a darker side. Emergency rooms are seeing more accidents involving young riders, many of whom ride without helmets or experience. "We've had an increase in scooter-related injuries,” says Dr. Lewis from a London hospital. “Most could be avoided with basic safety gear and respect for traffic rules.”

Parking is another headache. Shared scooters often end up abandoned on pavements, blocking pedestrians and creating visual clutter. City councils and scooter companies are now introducing parking zones and fines to address the problem.

Despite the challenges, few doubt that electric scooters are here to stay. They represent a new kind of mobility — one that’s personal, fast, and eco-friendly. For teenagers, they offer independence and excitement; for cities, they bring opportunities to rethink urban transport.

The key question now is whether users, parents, and policymakers can strike the right balance between freedom and safety. If they can, electric scooters might just roll us all toward a cleaner, smarter future.

Stand up to Cyberbullying

Cyberbullying is one of the most painful experiences a teenager can face. It can turn the internet—a place meant for fun and connection—into a source of fear and humiliation.

3.0.A.... . But no matter how dark it seems, you are not alone, and there are ways to fight back and protect yourself.

The most important rule is do not answer the bully.3.1. . Instead, collect the evidence—take screenshots, save messages, and keep a record of every cruel post. These can later become proof when you report the bullying.

Then, block and report the person on every platform. Most social media sites have options to stop someone from contacting you. 3.2. . Reporting is not just about you—it helps protect others who might become the bully’s next target.

You should also speak up and seek help. Tell your parents, a trusted teacher, or a school counsellor. 3.3. . If you ever feel threatened or unsafe, go to the police. What’s happening to you is not “just a joke”—it’s harassment, and it’s serious.

Most importantly, take care of your heart and mind. 3.4. . Reach out to friends who lift you up. Spend time doing things that make you feel strong.3.5. . Remember—you are more than the cruel words of others.

Finally, when you’re ready, turn your pain into power. 3.6. . Share your story to inspire others. Your courage can light the way for someone else trapped in silence. Together, we can make the internet a place of respect, not cruelty.

- ~~A. When cruel messages, photos, or lies spread online, they can feel impossible to escape.~~
B. Do not let anybody blackmail you.
C. Use them immediately.
D. Face to face confrontation with the bullies may be too risky.
E. Take breaks from social media.
F. Every angry reply gives them more power.
G. Speak out, join anti-bullying campaigns.
H. Keeping it secret only gives the bully more control.
I. Cyberbullying can leave deep emotional scars.
